

Their five daughters have all moved away from the village of Luzhai in eastern China and are working with their husbands in China's booming cities. Ma Jinling, 81, and his wife, Hou Guiying, don't own a phone or know where their children are living; their daughters rarely visit and even more rarely help financially. The frail Ma survives, as he always has, by tending his small plot of land.

"If he doesn't farm, we won't have enough food to eat," said Hou, 71, her hair in pigtails and her hands shaking as she spoke. "When we run out of money for our medical bills, we just stop treating ourselves."

"We can live like this, it's okay. But please, don't let us become really ill."

Decades of societal turmoil — radical communism followed by rampant capitalism — have frayed the ties that once bound China's families together extremely closely. In a country famous for its Confucian traditions of filial obedience, tens of millions of elderly Chinese are being left behind by the country's transformation, suffering poverty, illness and depression. It has become such a serious problem that the Chinese government put into effect a law in July allowing parents to sue their children if they failed to visit and support them.

"Many rural children don't treat their parents that well," said Zhao Yaohui of Peking University, co-author of a recent study of the problems facing China's oldest people. For centuries, patriarchs controlled their families' limited resources in the countryside. But

Hover state for avatars and queried twitter list

Yuri Victor, Joey Marburger and 45 other people you follow on Twitter tweeted about this

First two followees to tweet out on subject get pulled out.
(Effectively gives credit to folks who care about "firsts") Subsequently link off to the specific tweets themselves.

The rest get clumped into a twitter query that we would create by generating url.

Their five daughters have all moved away from the village of Luzhai in eastern China and are working with their husbands in China's booming cities. Ma Jinling, 81, and his wife, Hou Guiying, don't own a phone or know where their children are living; their daughters rarely visit and even more rarely help financially. The frail Ma survives, as he always has, by tending his small plot of land.

"If he doesn't farm, we won't have enough food to eat," said Hou, 71, her hair in pigtails and her hands shaking as she spoke. "When we run out of money for our medical bills, we just stop treating ourselves."

"We can live like this, it's okay. But please, don't let us become really ill."

Decades of societal turmoil — radical communism followed by rampant capitalism — have frayed the ties that once bound China's families together extremely closely. In a country famous for its Confucian traditions of filial obedience, tens of millions of elderly Chinese are being left behind by the country's transformation, suffering poverty, illness and depression. It has become such a serious problem that the Chinese government put into effect a law in July allowing parents to sue their children if they failed to visit and support them.

"Many rural children don't treat their parents that well," said Zhao Yaohui of Peking University, co-author of a recent study of the problems facing China's oldest people. For centuries, patriarchs controlled their families' limited resources in the countryside. But

Hover state for queried twitter list

425 Original Tweets

3,084 Retweets

2,967 Favorites

7,236 Replies to Original Tweets

+ More

240 Original Tweets

4,024 Retweets

2,512 Favorites

304 Replies to Original Tweets

+ More

Share tools deep link to anchor tags in story